The Tablets of Fate combine the randomness of casting lots with numerology. No one knows how old they are or who devised them, but they first received widespread exposure in seventeenth century chapbooks, cheaply-made and mass-produced pamphlets on a variety of subjects for those who enjoyed reading, but couldn't afford books. The Tablets of Fate enjoyed a renewed popularity in the nineteenth century, although more as a parlor game than as a serious divination method.

Aside from these tablets, you will need a pointer, such as a pen, pencil, stylus, or the like. A third recommended piece of equipment is some kind of spinning surface, such as a lazy-susan, a record-player set to 33rpm, or a potter's wheel, in order to make your forecast more truly a matter of fate. Traditionally, a second person was required to turn the tablet three times, while the forecaster shut their eyes and concentrated on their question, then pointed at random. The problem with this approach is, depending on the person doing the turning, they may deliberately leave you with only the reversed meanings to choose from. A spinning surface eliminates the need for a possibly-biased or mischievous second person.

When you have chosen the tablet appropriate to your question, start the tablet spinning, then close your eyes and focus on your question. Some authorities on this method say you should trace your pointer in the air in the form of a square or circle three times before bringing the pointer down on the tablet, after which you may open your eyes. Note the number you landed on and whether the page was up right or upside-down, then find your answer on the answer-key page.

Consulting the Tablet of the Sphinx must come first, as that tablet tells you if now is a good time to ask. The Sphinx, Sun, Moon, Mercury, Venus, Mars, and Jupiter tablets are traditional tablets. All others are tablets of my own devising.
